The idea behind Lead Trace

For people who sell

B2B sales teams
Agencies pitching clients
Founders finding customers

Before the conversation

What is sourced?
What is inferred?
What should I ask?

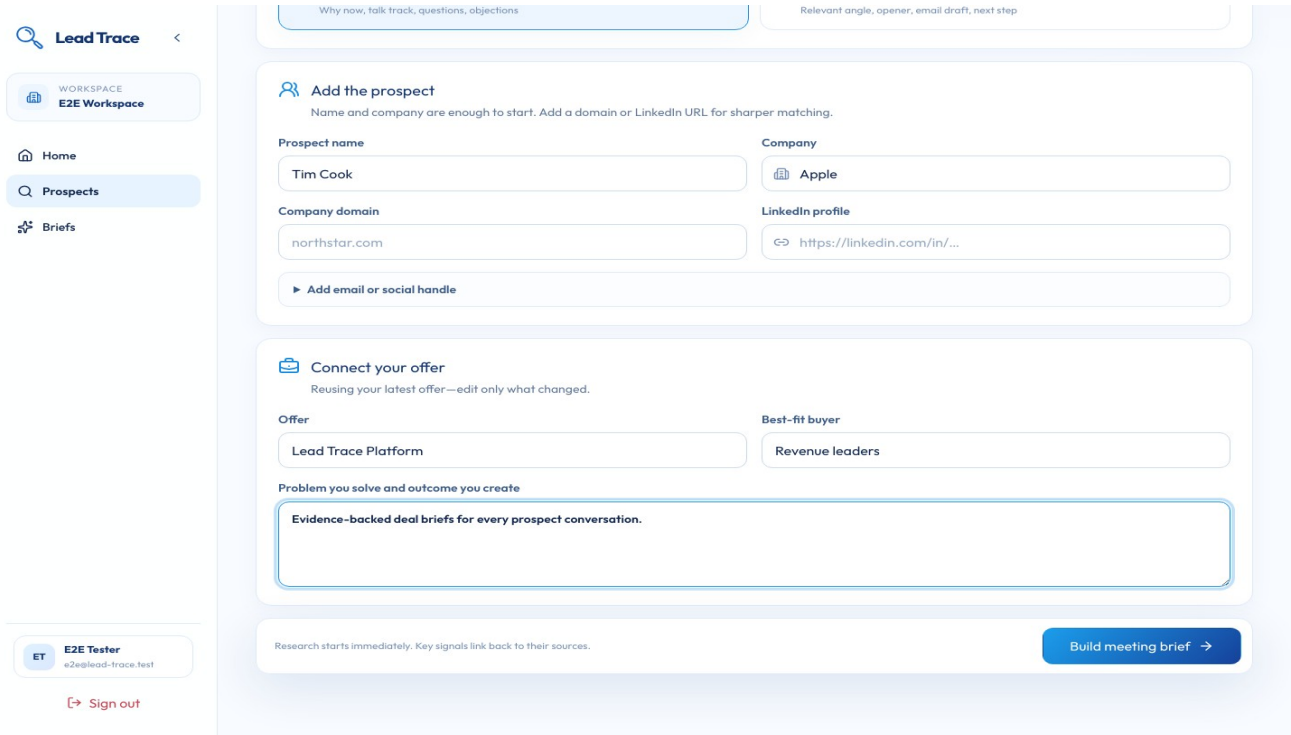

Each angle connects a public claim to your offer.

A hypothesis explains the possible fit. A question helps you test it.

Meeting prep or outreach

You choose the goal.

Add a prospect and explain what you sell. Lead Trace keeps both in context.

Meeting: talking points and questions

Outreach: an opener and draft to adapt

How a Deal Brief takes shape

Context

Prospect, offer, and chosen goal

Discovery

Relevant public company signals

Evidence

Claims with source links

Brief

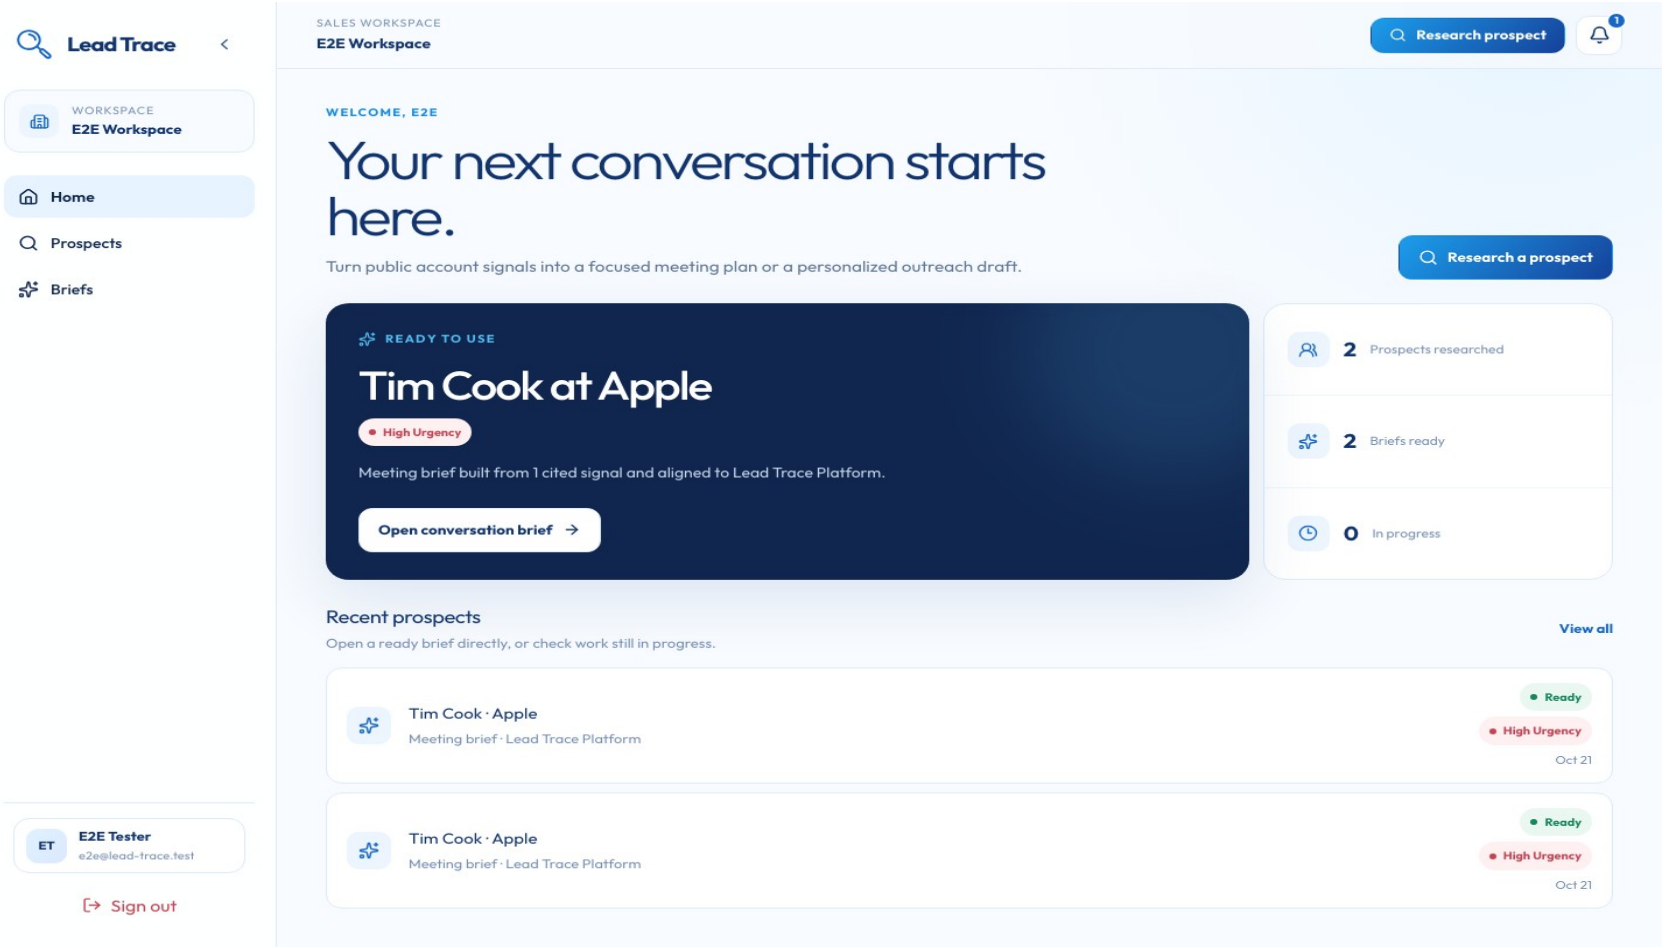

Brief and citation checks

Review

Check gaps and adapt the output

Sources stay attached so the seller can review the reasoning.

Team workspace

Conversation angles you can test

Demonstration example: leadership context

Source claim

Timothy Donald Cook is the chief executive officer of Apple Inc.

Why it could matter

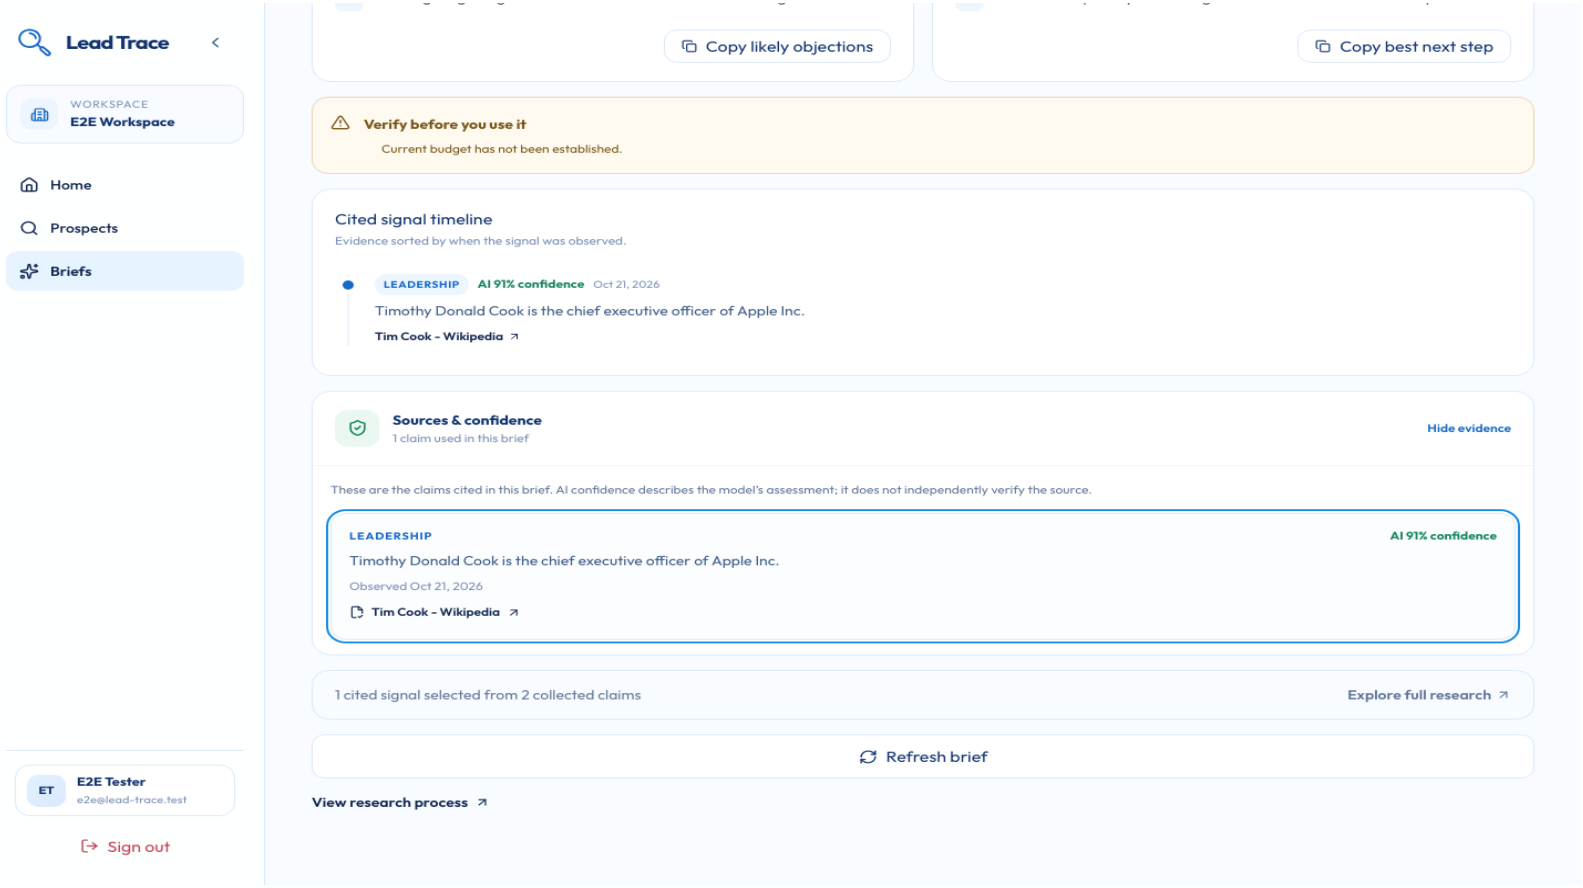

Leadership context helps frame a conversation. It does not establish a buying need, budget, or a reason to act now. The seller still needs to test the fit.

Hypothesis to validate

Ask in the conversation

Which current priority would make a focused conversation useful?

The evidence stays within reach

Trace each signal

Key signals must match a stored claim and its source URL.

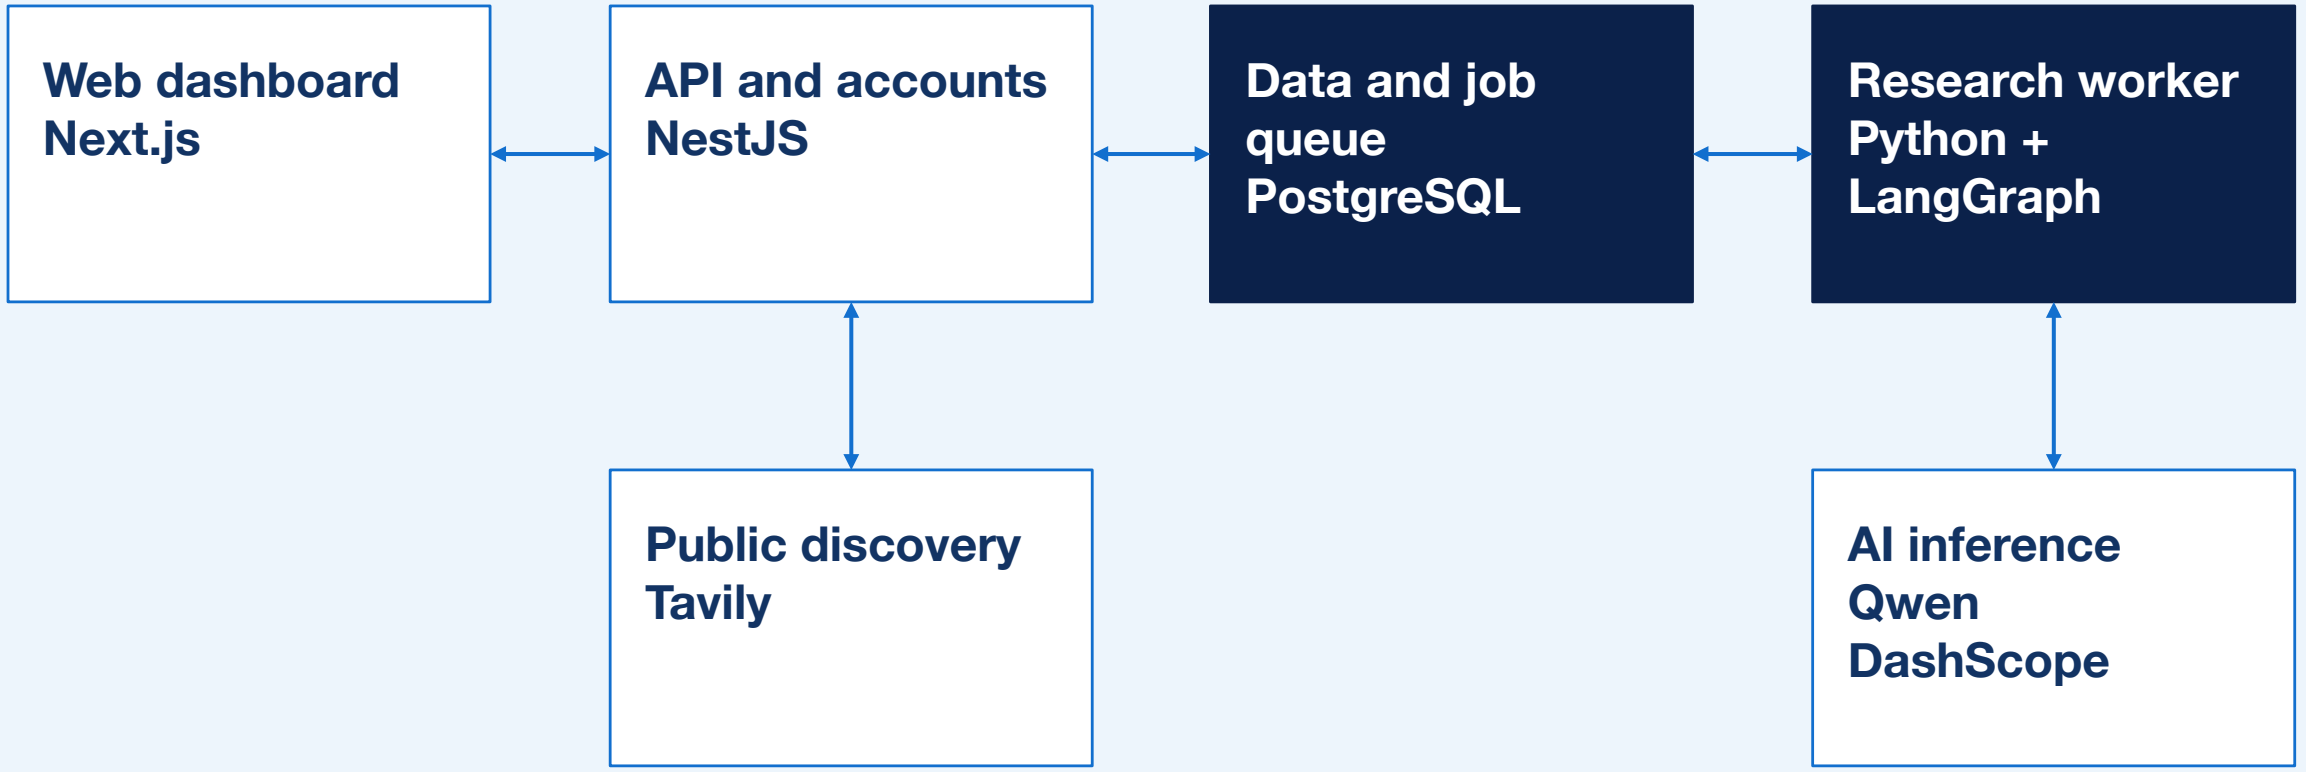

Check the gaps

Review freshness and contradictions before using the brief.

Demonstration fixture data. Source links make claims traceable, not guaranteed.

Architecture

A responsive app, with research running in the background

PostgreSQL stores workspace data and queues research jobs.

An outreach draft for your review

A source-based opener, a conditional fit, and a question that invites a reply.

Hi Tim,

I noticed your leadership role at Apple. I would like to understand which current priorities, if any, would make this conversation useful.

We help sales teams turn public prospect research into source-linked conversation briefs. If that relates to an active need, could we compare it with your current approach?

Best,
The Lead Trace team

Illustrative draft. Verify the source and personalize the message before sending.
